Huntington Beach, CA, September 25, 2003— With the talent crisis in the health services industry showing no signs of subsiding in the future, Allina Hospitals and Clinics has joined the young adult recruitment campaign of Teens4Hire.org to educate and attract teens into a field that is desperate for workers in just about every specialty at every level.

Teens can explore real jobs in hospital health services and teens interested in a future career with Allina Hospitals and Clinics can get all the information they need on www.teens4hire.org, a national online career center for employers and teens in the high school and college age groups. The service is free for teens.

“We have tailored the information to meet the needs of teenagers,” says Renee Ward, founder/executive director of Teens4Hire.org. “There are jobs available at Allina Hospitals and Clinics and health services workers at all levels of education and training are needed. In some cases, a four year degree is not required for high paying jobs.”

Allina Hospitals and Clinics, a network of hospitals, clinics and patient services serve communities in Minnesota and western Wisconsin, with general health and specialty care services, 24-hour emergency care and community outreach programs.

High school graduates and junior college students can apply online for paid entry level jobs and if hired, may qualify for generous tuition assistance to pursue a career in a high paying specialty area such as radiography, respiratory care, surgical technology, and nursing.

Scholarships and loan programs are available too.

Teens, as young as 14, can qualify for meaningful volunteer opportunities that exist today. “This is great experience for young teenagers who have aspirations of pursuing a medical or health services career,” says Ward.

Allina provides valuable information for teens including an interactive Q&A area.

If you're a teen who's undecided about a career, you owe it to yourself to check out the opportunities that Allina Hospitals and Clinics offer.
